

My experience at ACCC10

I was very glad to have the opportunity to attend ACCC10 in Hanoi, Vietnam. I was also fortunate to give an oral presentation and share the research I have conducted during my PhD journey. Before departing, I felt quite nervous when I saw the presentation schedule—I was worried that I might not perform well enough or be unable to answer questions from the audience. Since this was my first time participating in such a large international conference, I felt a bit overwhelmed. Compared with any conference I had attended in Taiwan, this experience felt entirely different in scale, atmosphere, and level of professionalism. Because of that, I reminded myself repeatedly that I had to prepare as thoroughly as possible.

During the preparation process, I reviewed my research from a more critical perspective. This not only helped me refine the way I organized my data and presented my ideas, but also made me more aware of the limitations and blind spots in my current work. In a way, preparing for this presentation became a valuable learning experience on its own, pushing me to think deeper about how I can further improve my research in the future.

At the conference, I was exposed to a wide variety of topics that I had never encountered before. Listening to researchers from different countries present their findings broadened my academic horizons. I also learned about ongoing and past research conducted by international scholars, which gave me new insights into the current global research trends. Many of the ideas I heard were fresh, inspiring, and completely outside of what I had originally imagined. This not only enriched my understanding of my own field, but also sparked new possibilities for future collaborations and research directions.

Overall, attending ACCC10 was an incredibly rewarding experience. It helped me grow both academically and personally. I gained confidence in presenting my work on an international stage, learned how to communicate more clearly with a diverse audience, and discovered new perspectives that will undoubtedly influence my future research. I am truly grateful for this opportunity, and I hope that I can continue to participate in more international conferences as I move forward in my academic career.
